October 25 marked the 65th anniversary of Taiwan's liberation from Japanese colonial rule. That day in 1945 also represented a start for Taiwan, one that would carry the country into the modern era that would see the replacement of an authoritarian government with democracy, the creation of an economic miracle, and the formation of a collective national identity. In order to leave a historical record of that time, the National Central Library (NCL) published the "Bibliography of Publications on Taiwan's Retrocession and Online Resources for Taiwan Studies." This guide provides the public with reference material for further study on this subject. It contains bibliographies for 234 resources related to Taiwan's retrocession (including 170 books and 64 academic papers), as well as information on 176 online resources for Taiwan studies. The guide focuses mainly on political, economic, social, and cultural aspects of Taiwan from the later part of the Japanese occupation period to the early post-war period. The online resources, in turn, are arranged in the categories of general resources, philosophy and religion, science, health and agriculture, social sciences, historical figures, language and literature, and the arts.
